Enrico Caruso returned to America vesterday with his bride of a year ago Ohl, daughter of Josiah Kingsley Ohl, his fifteen-year-old son, a bad cold and a grievance. His wife and son stood at the tenor's side on the deck of the Italian liner Giuseppe Verdi, while he nursed his cold with an innumerable succession of handkerchiefs and aired succession of handkerchiefs and aired his grievance for the benefit of the re-porters who gathered about him. The burden of his tale was the forcible removal from his pressions. grateful proletariat of Florence of sun-dry hams, choeses, casks of wine, hogs-heads of clive oil and the narrow escape of his chickens, or rather his wife's chickens, from a similar fate.

"It was a mean trick," he said. "We were on my farm near Florence. A hun-dred and fifty of the neighbors came to the gates and cheered—a touching welcome home. I went down and talked to them and they told me with tears in their eyes that they had been without wine and cheese all through the war. "So I opened the gates and bade them enter. They covered the lawn and I had wine and cheese brought out to their and they feasted and we were all very happy. And they went away.

They Return With Papers.

They carried away twenty-seven casks of wine. They took four dozen of my finest hams and I know not how much olive oil. And they were very happy and very polite and very rough.
"But my wife averted one tragedy.
The crowd was about to take all my chickens also, and wring their necks and She could not have their necks wrung. She pleaded with the crowd and her Italian is very good. The people were moved. They relented. The chickens were saved."

In spite of his experiences at the hands of the Florentines the singer confessed that he had gained forty pounds during his stay abroad. He did not mind the loss of the wine so much, he said, as he has to abstain from it for the sake of his voice, and besides he had sold it three days before to a man who contracted to remove it immediately. contracted to remove it immediately, but the loss of the hams and cheese seemed to rankle in his mind.

The smaller managers in break-up would be liable to find them selves in the position of the playwrights who yesterday made another determined effort to gain a little more attention than heretofore and to discount the saying that nobody loves a fat play-wright - r a thin one or any variety.
